Foreword

Congratulations on your wise investment in this excellent publication, which will provide invaluable orientation to the diversity of funding offered by the UK's grant-making foundations.

Grants are an increasingly vital source of support for civil society. Foundation grant-making in the UK is now at a record £2.7 billion, according to our 2016 report Giving Trends: Top 300 Foundation Grant-makers, which makes grant-making foundations the biggest single source of grant funding to the voluntary sector. At the same time, grants from government are waning as it increasingly shifts its funding priorities towards contracts. This matters, because grants represent a unique social currency that enables charities to be innovative, resilient, and responsive in pursuit of their mission. So while funding from grant-making foundations cannot be expected to replace the loss of government grants, their sustained commitment to maintaining their level of grant spend should be celebrated.

The nature of the grants is as important as the amount. The UK has nearly 13,000 grant-making foundations (according to NCVO's UK Civil Society Almanac 2017), and these organisations bring pluralism and creativity to civil society, backing unpopular causes, preserving what works and challenging what does not. They need not be driven by short-term political or economic cycles and can weather history's storms in a way that other sources of funding cannot. They come in all shapes and sizes, offering support to causes ranging from research on the human genome to repairing village halls – a variety of provision that reflects the vibrant diversity of UK society. So the good news is that whatever cause you are fundraising for, you are likely to find a good potential match within the pages of this volume.

In order to make grants effectively, grant-making foundations increasingly rely on good data to inform decision-making and help them make the most of their resources. Equally, in this tough climate for fundraisers, data on who is funding what, where, and how can make all the difference.

The Directory of Grant Making Trusts is an invaluable source of quality data connecting fundraisers with grant-making foundations. By providing such data, the directory saves fundraisers and grant-makers alike an enormous amount of time, effort and, ultimately, precious resources. Most importantly, the directory opens up new opportunities for grant-making foundations to build partnerships with grantees. After all, it is these relationships that enable funders to achieve their charitable objectives, preserving social good when it is under threat and catalysing it where it is absent.
